FRIGHTENED INTO HOMICIDE

HE one virtue of this story above all others is that it is true; and with a change of names only, is exactly as the records of the supreme court of California tell it to-day.

Early in 1890 Tom Jermyn, a youngster of 23, left his home in New Jersey and sought fortune in the far West. As many before him had done, he worked from place to place, forgetting the maxim that a rolling stone gathers no moss, and after having tried half a dozen states and territories he found himself, in the spring of '91, in Los Angeles, friendless, homeless and all but penniless.

The situation was not a pleasant one. The "boom" of two or three years before had left the town quiet, and after a few weeks of searching he came to the conclusion that his only chance to escape starvation or the penitentiary was to go into the mining districts, and therefore thither he went.

With varying success he found his way from one to another of the camps along the Sierras, until one day he struck a new one, far up the country toward Death's valley, named "Last Ditch," and there fell into companionship and finally into partnership with a man almost twice his age by the name of John Selden, "Quick Jim," as he was better known in all the mining region.

The friendship was a strange one. The boy, for he was but a boy, was not a drinker nor a thief, was willing to do as he would be done by, and to work. Selden, on the contrary, was a hard drinker, loved gaming and cheating of any and every sort, had killed his man, yes, men, being known as a desperado when in liquor, and was altogether a person to be avoided.

And yet the two seemed to have a mutual attraction, for their acquaintance, begun by chance, ripened, as I have said, into actual friendship, and for nearly two years they were "partners" in all business relations and became much attached to each other.

The fellowship was like to do Jermyn harm rather than to help Selden, but such was not the case. The elder man turned a sharp corner, became interested in actual mining in the legitimate way, drunk but little and almost never got into any row. His old companions viewed the change with delight, for he had always been considered "dangerous," and the hope was generally expressed that Jim's last love was going to reform and make a worthy man of him.

Matters were in this happy state when the two became possessed of a mining claim near Dry Salt Lake in the El Paso district, which rapidly developed into a valuable one, and from which they took a considerable quantity of gold.

Day after day they worked as neither of them had ever worked before, and night after night they estimated their increasing wealth and figured on the time, apparently near at hand, when they should have enough of the precious dust to return to civilization, able to establish themselves in some regular business. They were, in fact, making a profit of several hundred dollars per day, when, just as fortune had thus turned her fickle smile upon them, Selden fell a prey to his old enemy, began to drink to excess, became at once sullen, ugly and overbearing to all about him, and, as he had never done before, turned upon his boy partner and charged him with defrauding him in their partnership division.

Surprised and hurt, Jermyn for a time tried to explain to his friend that he was dealing fairly in all things, but day by day Selden grew worse, until one night, as they were weighing

"Jim, look up!" and fired.

Selden's face was raised, his eyes caught sight of the red flames, he whirled half about, his hand at his hip, and fell dead upon the pavement, his heart shot out!

For a month Jermyn was in the hospital, but when at last he had recovered from the terror and strain of his experience and was brought to trial it was a matter of great ease for his counsel to obtain an acquittal and a verdict of "justifiable homicide," for all the jury felt that it was "kill, or be killed," and not the less was that their conclusion when it appeared that the dead man's hand, warned by the voice that spoke from the window even as the triggers had been pressed, had sprung to his pistol and half drawn it before the fatal bullet had torn his heart and life from him.

Had Jermyn waited three seconds he would have been the victim. He knew it and fired first.

But that condition did not ensue, on the contrary, no sooner had the elder man broken with his partner than he plunged into deeper excesses than before, gave up his work, finally sold the claim at a great sacrifice, and spent all his time in savage drunkenness, constantly swearing that he had but one thought left in life, and that to find and kill Jermyn.

Too often the man who has done another a wrong hates him for that very reason, strange as it may seem, and that was the condition of mind that Selden had now reached.

Meantime, Jermyn, advised by men who had known Selden for years, hid himself and waited from day to day, hoping against hope
